One of the fundamental processes in cancer development is the interaction between tumor cells and their microenvironment. They establish a unique type of communication known as tumor-stroma interactions. These interactions are mediated by exogenous molecules such as cytokines, hormones, growth factors and by a class of cells termed stromal cells. Not much is known regarding the role of the v-erbB family of proteins in regulating microenvironment-driven cell transformation. In the present study, we investigated the role of the v-erbB homologous to human epidermal growth factor receptor 2 (HER2/ERB-B) in the regulation of proliferation and apoptosis in the highly metastatic human breast cancer cell line MDA-MB-231. Treatment of MDA-MB-231 cells with v-erbB specific double-stranded RNA (dsRNA) significantly reduced their proliferation in comparison to vector dsRNA-treated cells (p no, I'm not a neat freak, you may be thinking. But I do have to have a back-up plan, in case I don't have anything to wear. One morning while I was traveling I couldn't find my shoulder bag, and that's a very stressful feeling, because I need that bag to have my cell phone, wallet, keys and all that stuff in it
