When the bullet hits the target it must damage the target. I am using ray casting to see if a collision has taken place. This is working fine. My problem is that I do not want the bullet to damage anything other than the target. If it does it damage something else then what is the best way to deal with this? A: There is no "best" way to deal with this as long as it's "right" for your game. It will depend on your game and what your game needs. For example, you could have the bullet take damage if it collides with anything that isn't the target, while leaving the target alone. Or you could have the bullet turn into an energy ball when it strikes a wall or other object. If you need help coming up with the "right" solution, or if you need help with some code, post a sample game. Edit: To answer your edit to the question, I suggest you look at this: You could write the target to detect collision with a certain body type and the bullet to detect collision with anything but the target. You could also write a "damage" body that detects collision with anything, and then evaluates which bodies should be damaged. You need to download an app called "Bluetooth Controller" from the PlayStore (Not the game itself). Do this by downloading the app and you'll be able to download "GTA SA" for free. A: You do not have "GTA sa" in your play store. You should be using this app Q: Will a Scanner's buffer of characters be emptied if an EOFException is caught? If I start a Scanner, enter one of the characters that normally cause EOFException, but the user of the scanner somehow never sees an EOFException, and instead catches an exception of the type InputMismatchException, will this have any effect? I ask because the documentation states: When this exception is thrown by the next() method, the buffer is no longer full. The remaining characters in the buffer are shifted left, so that characters may be read more efficiently when the next method is called. so I'm wondering if, in the case I've described, an EOFException would be thrown anyway. A: The following program doesn't set the buffer and throws an EOFException. public class Test { public static void main(String[] args) throws IOException { char[] buf = new char[100]; Scanner sc = new Scanner(System.in); sc.useDelimiter(""); while(sc.hasNext()) buf[0] = sc.next(); sc.close(); } } EDIT It occurs to me that the following might answer the OP's question. The following program does set the buffer public class Test { public static void main(String[] args) throws IOException { e24f408de9
