Random Number Generator [Updated]

Create random numbers in a variety of bases. Requirements: PC .NET Framework Learn to recognize an unknown number of unknown digits in any position Consider the following list of numbers: 12345 123456 1234567 123456789 1234567890 The first three of them are eight digits, the next two are seven, and the last one is nine. If you don't know whether the number is eight or nine, or seven or eight, or nine, but you want to create a random integer in a range like 12345-1234567, how do you do it? Given the variety of digits in any position, it is tricky to create a random number that doesn't contain any of them, just like it is impossible to consistently select numbers from a pool of different objects. As it turns out, you simply try the same method. The solution is simple and is based on the creation of random numbers by taking random numbers and generating them by the addition of random values. These are probably your general strategies: Generate a random number in the range 12345 Two random numbers 12 + 34 Random numbers separated by a space 123 456 A greater number 123 456 789 Every number has a portion of a digit, and the greater number should have a greater proportion of digits than the smaller number. Take a look at the number 12345, which has five digits. While only two of them are used for 12345, five are added to create a random number. When the random number is smaller than, for example, 789, the number will have five digits from 123 and will have another 5 from 456, and 789 is then removed from the random number. The lower the proportion of digits, the more random the number is going to be. Take note that the greater the number, the greater the proportion of digits compared to the smaller number. The smaller number becomes the denominator, and for that reason you'll have numbers like 51 and 858, while the larger one is more likely to be an alphabetic string. Lets Create Numbers List of Numbers 12345 123456 1234567 1234567890 Calculate the proportional ratio If you know the proportion of numbers in your pool, you can calculate a ratio like shown on the table below. The numbers in the list come from a pool with seven items, that
