The New York Times has a good summary of both the stakes and the strategy at play right now in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination. It explains why the three candidates on the stage — Hillary Clinton, Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley — are spending more time, money and effort than ever to win over delegates at state conventions and caucus events. It explains why more than half of all delegates will be chosen at those events, making the March 4 primaries and caucuses among the most important in American history. It explains why, right now, the biggest question for Clinton's campaign is whether Sanders can cut into her delegate advantage while continuing to have momentum going into the next primary. It explains why, for Clinton, one of the questions in the next couple of weeks will be whether the delegates who have not yet pledged themselves to her have already made up their minds on how to vote. The Times article explains the pace at which the primary season has gone, and the intensity with which the Democratic candidates are fighting over delegates. Here are some other points worth thinking about: On Saturday, when former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley finally joined the campaign trail, even his supporters said they viewed him as a spoiler. A day later, more than 1,000 people showed up for a speech at a New York-area college to hear him speak. The article notes that the Democratic primary system is based on a power structure where party leaders and elected officials choose the party's candidates at the beginning of the process. "That means the pace of the nomination contest — as well as the number of pledged delegates
