The lymphatic system plays a critical role in both lymphocyte traffic and tissue remodeling. Lymphatic valves are essential elements of the lymphatic system, providing the means by which to return lymph and tissue back to the circulation. The lymphatic system is commonly employed for retraction of a flap (lymphatic turnover) or for waste (lymphatic transit) and is employed in the handling of inflammatory fluid drainage. Injury to the lymphatic system leads to the formation of fibrotic tissue. The precise composition and biochemistry of lymph are currently under investigation. However, it is believed that for proper immune responses, cells need to traffic between the blood and lymphatic vessels through specialized structures known as high endothelial venules (HEV). See, e.g., Carmeliet P. & J. P. J. Exp. Biol. 2002, 204, 2811-2823. These high endothelial venules are thought to play a role in the migration of leukocytes into secondary lymphoid organs and the initiation of immune responses. Cells could use the lymphatic system for immune surveillance or for migration, proliferation, and differentiation within lymphoid tissues. See, e.g., Morgan et al., Lancet 1:1158-1164 (1988).
