Computer games are often enjoyed by a plurality of players, where each player can participate in the game in real-time by interacting with the game. Typically, such computer games have a plurality of players who can interact with the game and with each other in real-time. Simulations are often used as games, often using a computer modeling scheme to create a simulation world within a computer, with computer representation of the objects within the simulation world. As players interact with the game, scores and other data indicative of their performance in the game may be stored. The stored performance data may be averaged together and updated periodically to produce a leaderboard for each simulation in the game. A console game may also host a leaderboard, which hosts an average player ranking for each round. The average player ranking is typically determined on a number of factors, such as how many games the player won or lost, how long the player was in the game, how many points were obtained in the game, etc. The use of the same reference symbols in different drawings indicates similar or identical items.Q: Is it possible to achieve a simple horizontal stretched image wrap? I'm trying to achieve a simple horizontal stretchable image instead of a simple design wrap. Like the image above, I want to achieve this with a single line of code and out of UIImage, but of course I'm trying to achieve this with the previous code: self.img = [UIImage imageNamed:@"waves.png"]; self.img.frame = CGRectMake(0, 0, 1111, 1111); Is this possible at all or am I going about this in a totally wrong way? A: So the idea is to draw a custom image to a CGContext with a specific CGPoint that is stretched horizontally. You start with a view containing an imageview that is perfectly square in the center. Now add a blank subview to the view that is the size of the image and set its background color to the same color as the imageview (or whatever). This will draw a square image, of which the bottom edge is a different color than the top edge. The top edge should be a quarter of the total width of the view so
