Rolling Stones And Metallica Plot TV Show In the early 1990s, the Rolling Stones and Metallica got into a bit of a money dispute. As is often the case, the brawl spilled into the courtroom with the band's lawyers suing one another. Rolling Stone's legal team had won a suit against Metallica, but the latter band's lawyers were plotting revenge. A little known story was that they'd actually been plotting this for a year. In 1994, they put the plan into action, with former Rolling Stone managing director and producer Jeff Adams being targeted. The suit was dropped due to lack of evidence, but the incident served to remind Rolling Stone of the talent that lay below the rock-band hype. The band's Creative Director Jason Fine told us: "When they were suing us, it made me think of how certain bands were marketed, and to a certain degree, we were incredibly fortunate to actually be there." He continued: "The story that the Rolling Stone lawyers wanted to retell was that we were fired to save the company, but it also made us aware of how we were perceived - like we were the second-class rock band." Although the band were going through a lot at the time, especially Mick Jagger, the album Voodoo Lounge offered something new to fans in a world of Stones rehashes. While many were critical of the new-wave pop-rock sound, the band had created an album that moved them on an emotional level, which was something that the band had rarely achieved before. However, it's not just the music which has attracted new generations to the band. Now, interestingly enough, the band are filming a movie for Showtime. Jason continued: "We actually had one [rel="nofollow"]Thanks, Jen, for hosting me today. What goes up must come down, and sometimes, like in Yosemite, you are not in the descent zone when an accident happens, and it happens while you are having one of the most fun things a climber can do. It was the end of a long season and I had just finished my final day of work and was home on a leftover day of leave. I was raring to have some good rockfishing after working on the steep, boulder-filled lake water all summer. Hitting the lake for the big fish was in my plans - for this time - and I even looked forward to the close encounter as well. In the end, I cashed in on that opportunity before the final day of the leave would end and I would head back to the office. It started to rain on the last day and I was hopeful that it would hold off just long enough to make a late lake fishing trip that day even possible. Even if it was short-lived, I'd still be fishing. I met up with my buddy Charley and the plan was for us to do a little scouting first. I would fish first and Charley would do a "top-down" survey of the lake first. We'd then tie up and wait for things to move a bit before we started fishing. I wasn't there for a full hour before my phone rang with a call from my wife, who was a bit concerned about me. I'd been noticing how tired I was getting in the trailer and I said I'd hit the hay - so she assumed the worst. From that first call, it went straight into my head that something bad had happened, and when Charley didn't contact me for a few minutes, I knew I was right. Happily, my wife was wrong; I was having a decent nap and got a nice slumber. I awoke with a stiff neck, sore leg muscles and a bit of a scare. I knew immediately that the injury was serious when I had seen folks pop their lower back off the seat occasionally, in particular in the United Airlines (UAL) section of the seats. While I stood up, I felt a 'pop' in my neck and figured it was the fluid weight pushing out the tissues and keeping my head suspended. I tipped over in the seat and rolled onto my other arm, flat against the back of the seat and didn't bump my neck.
