chrome P450 monooxygenase (P450 or CYP) is the largest family of detoxification enzyme, known as hemoproteins, which can catalyze reactions of some exogenous and endogenous toxicants at specific P450 binding sites[@b1]. P450 is consisted of multiple types of isozymes, mainly classified into 2 kinds: the relatively stable isozymes and the highly regulated isozymes[@b2]. P450 plays important physiological and pathophysiological functions in multiple organs of animals. P450 catalyzes the rate-limiting step of phase 1 detoxification, which is responsible for metabolism of a variety of chemically reactive compounds[@b3]. It is reported that P450 disorders and changes in metabolisms were closely associated with a variety of diseases, including cancer, metabolic disorders, and neurological diseases[@b4][@b5]. P450 has been recognized as an important drug target that influences the activity of drugs in the past decades[@b6]. Thus, P450 is included in some important drug developing programs, such as the "diabetes" drug, "cancer" drug, and "hypertension" drug. A strong binding affinity to P450 is considered the essential criterion for these drugs. Recent study found that a multi-body docking predictor, which contained selected atomic contacts within the binding site and a ΔG computations, performed better than a single body docking predictor in predicting P450 binding affinity[@b7]. Moreover, an in vivo study of seven P450 isozymes of drug-drug interaction for clinical medicines revealed that five drug-drug pairs displayed the expected metabolism trends due to the P450 inhibitions[@b8]. Therefore, the high-throughput determination of P450 inhibition is considered as an important strategy for drug development. Researchers have found that the structure of P450, which belongs to the member of hemoprotein family, would be the determinant[@b9][@b10][@b11][@b12].

However, a precise binding mechanism and prediction method are still lacking. Although the crystal structure of P450 from Nippostrongylus brieschkei (NbCyp6AS1) (PDB ID: 3B8S) was successfully determined in 2013[@b13], none of the P450 structures in complex with drugs are available until now. The lack of the crystal structure caused major problems for the structure-based drug design.
