That also applies to the members of the Paraguayan Legislative Assembly, where, in a recently held session, the new, post-dictatorship constitution was adopted. There can be little doubt that this is a landmark day in Paraguayan history. For the first time in recent decades, the people of Paraguay have won their independence and have their constitution under their own control. 'Citizen legislature' For a decade, the United States and the Latin American Coalition for a Democratic Paraguay (COLPAR) have been working to hold an election for a constituent assembly. These efforts started as an emergency measure when Paraguay's judicial system was controlled by a military dictatorship which was threatening to execute "subversives" and torture its citizens. The U.S. government and the other COLPAR members, Germany, France, Mexico, Brazil and Argentina, were in contact with the government of the newly elected president, Andrzej Deskur, and offered a help and support mission for free democratic elections. They were also quick to point out that the military government must yield its power, and that free elections must be held. After a year and a half of negotiations on a form of government that would guarantee civil liberties, the fact that the House of Representatives would be elected by universal suffrage and would consist of a legislature and a judiciary, the people of Paraguay had won a decisive victory in their struggle for democracy. At this point, the U.S. government and COLPAR moved to the next step. They began working with the new constitutional assembly to draft a new constitution and devise a plan for a constitutional referendum. For a decade, the United States and the members of COLPAR had worked with the Paraguayan people for a free and democratic Paraguay. They had seen the injustices of the dictatorship and would not tolerate the separation of power in the country and its return to the dictatorship. The U
