Free Photoshop alternatives exist, but you have to watch out for quality. Other programs such as Paint Shop Pro and Krita offer similar editing functions but are not as robust and feature rich. Photoshop's image editing tools aren't the only things you can do with it. It's an excellent program for image management and creation. With a large library of tools and extensive tutorials, you can work with a variety of image formats, combine images, create graphics, and add text all within this application. Using Photoshop Elements The same features of Photoshop that make it a professional-level image editor also make it an excellent tool for beginner image editing. While the interface is somewhat complex at first, the programs tools and capabilities enable you to create beautiful works of art in no time at all. Like other image editing programs, Photoshop Elements uses a layer-based editing system that enables you to edit multiple layers. Figure 1-12 shows the editing tools you see in most versions of Photoshop Elements. The editing tools include the addition and manipulation of layers; the creation of selections from objects; the ability to make simple shapes such as rectangles; the compositing of two or more images; and the creation of complex and sophisticated images. Getting familiar with the interface Photoshop Elements displays the interface in a three-dimensional model similar to how it looks on a computer monitor. In a sense, it is like a window into the program, just like you might see in a window on a computer monitor. When you're editing an image in Photoshop Elements, you are actually working within that window. Figure 1-12: Photoshop Elements' interface is based on multiple overlapping layers that enable you to apply and edit many different aspects of an image. The user interface has three windows, each with a different purpose. The Windows window (refer to Figure 1-12) is used to access all the tools for editing images in Photoshop Elements. The Draw window and the Image window are used to display and manage your images, respectively. The Window and Layers tabs are active in all three windows. The tabs display a small preview of the layers that are selected in each window and makes it possible to switch between them. The left side of the Window and Layers tabs contains the individual buttons for each window. You can press the window buttons to close them, hide them, or bring them back again. You can also press the B key on the keyboard to go back to the preceding image in the

The El Lay Tech Startup Bubble That's About To Burst Kyle Whittingham, right, moved to El Lay Tech Hub last month to serve as chief executive officer for El Lay Startup Hub. Kevin Rueggsegger Kyle Whittingham, executive director and owner of El Lay Tech Hub, has grown the high-tech business incubator in El Lay from a few dozen employees to more than 100. With plans to double that number this year, and to add an office near the University of California at San Diego this fall, Whittingham thinks the city's next economic boom is at hand. The brainchild of Whittingham, a Salt Lake City businessman and owner of the Summit Clipper hockey franchise, El Lay Tech Hub is a for-profit business accelerator that offers financing, marketing help, mentoring, office space, help securing a trade-show booth and more. The hub's third class of startups, which starts in September, will have roughly 40 companies in its ranks. That number is small compared with the number of tech startups in San Diego, but Whittingham says he plans to grow his team to 200 employees in 2010. "Our goals were really to create a hub to be a core location where the companies that we are growing would be located, we'd be the folks that were doing research and development and engineering," Whittingham says. "And that would be a core point of contact for startups in El Lay." In August, the hub opened an incubator for technology companies focused on media, entertainment and internet startups, making the El Lay Tech Hub one of the first incubators in North America focused on web-based startups in the entertainment and media categories. The other hubs are based in New York, Austin, Texas, and San Francisco. Whittingham's plan is to use his hub as a platform to help companies move into other parts of the region and potentially beyond California. Last month, the U.S. Department of Energy announced a $100,000 investment in El Lay Tech Hub to support the hub's accelerator. "There's so much enthusiasm in San Diego," says Jani Adams, who oversees regional startup programs at the Department of Energy. "That makes El Lay Tech Hub even more essential to the regional ecosystem." A small business advocacy group, The Guild, has given the hub a $10,000 award through its Emerging Leaders program, which helps new business owners start or grow their companies.
