Yeelight There is one thing in this world that I really love, and that is fantasy. I don't mean fantasy of violent worlds filled with monsters and heroes and story lines with heroic quests; no, I mean fantasy in the sense of a beautiful and marvellous world full of all the beauty and wonder a person can wish for. I really love a good fantasy. But I've grown up in a world where the games are so unbelievably boring that I almost never played them. This was partly because the few games that I managed to play were just so dull and lacking in all the awesome things I love about fantasy. But the real reason is that they were so ridiculously heavy in terms of who you fight and how many enemies are shooting at you. If I were to list the top fantasy games, it would be The Elder Scrolls V: Skyrim (PC), Dragon Age: Origins (PC), The Elder Scrolls IV: Oblivion (PC), Fire Emblem: Awakening (Wii U) and Dark Souls (DS). And I have to say that while all these are amazing games that offer so many wonderful things, they do all share the same characteristic, but it is this: You are a character that is restricted to one side of the fence. You either run from danger, or you run towards it. If you run away, you kill everything that comes after you, which means you can rest for a while, but you also can't do anything else. If you run towards danger, you fight a lot, but you also can't do anything else. Even something as simple as picking up stuff and throwing it somewhere is a task that requires you to fight or run. This is just how the game is set up. If you want to play as a tank, it's going to be a lot easier to run than to pick up a sword and take on the world. Of course, this isn't a bad thing in a game, because you get to play for hours and learn a whole load of moves. But my problem with this trend is that it makes the game so incredibly boring. This is where I started wondering why I had never played a good fantasy game and, naturally, I came to the conclusion that it was because I was spoiled by the fantasy of my childhood; I liked action games better. Then I started searching for a good fantasy action game that didn't make me feel bored the moment I picked it up and… I bff6bb2d33

Discrepancies of cost coverage within the liability system. During the first months of 1987, the New York State Legislature passed the "Industrial Insurance Marched States' Rate Wars" legislation, the first legislative intervention in the so-called rate wars between the Insurers and their employers. For State Employers having 50 employees or less, alterations in rates were allowed only for claim payments above designated dollar thresholds. Within the liability insurance environment, an anomalous proliferation of large Self-Insured Retention Arrangements (SIRA) by employers, increasing by 69 percent from 1986 to 1987, has occurred. Employers have been able to piece together sufficient financial resources to cover their potential SIRA liabilities, for reasons that include lower administrative costs and personnel-related benefits. Employers with large SIRA liabilities have available insurance resources that surpass liabilities potentially covered by State Workers' Compensation and Employer Liability Insurance Fund (SLIF) funds. Employers incurring SIRA liabilities of less than $30 million could be legitimately classified as Consumer Cost Intermediaries (CCI), while larger SIRA's are commercial cost intermediaries. SIRA's are also available for new, acquiring employers. The growth of SIRA's in New York deserves the attention of policy makers more than the rate wars.Q: Use the relation $|x-z|=|x|-|z|$ to prove $z\in(-x,-y)$ Use the relation
