Night games to be kept secret In normal times, squads of the paramilitary Border Patrol might have breakfast before their 60-mile run down an arid Texan plain, but this week they have been luckier than they were for the past nine months. Before their normal morning run, Chris Royster, who runs the 200m dash for the Texas Army National Guard's 1st Battalion (Engineer Company), says he was given a bromide delivery from headquarters: "You're getting an international call for a low probability high consequence event". That, he guesses, means they are getting their orders for the night's operation. For days, there has been speculation inside the city of 361 people that the Border Patrol would be sent into Mexico during a low flow of migrants, hoping to bust them. Fewer than 100 migrants, walking several miles a day, are straggling across the remote international boundary that has already been largely closed. They are among 8,000 to 9,000 who have crossed the border since January 2015, when unaccompanied children started arriving. When the Border Patrol announced that they were suspending their patrols in the area on February 4, the mayor, Enrique Martinez, said the next morning: "Tomorrow (February 5), we will see the doors open, because we can't even walk to the border without armed forces chasing us." That was partly a bluff. The mayor was also worried about the quick action of the Border Patrol, which had been picketed by protesters at a march when its members were accused of brutality against children in 2014. Shoot first, ask questions later Instead of answering the mayor's challenge, Texas Governor Greg Abbott, a Republican, announced in El Paso, further to the west, that he would be sending in troops, who they believed were from the Texas National Guard. But the governor said later that day he had no evidence that Mexico's army was involved. Border Patrol sector chiefs could be sacked The governor came under pressure from Democrats in the Texas congressional delegation, who called on him to clarify whose armed services were being sent. The head of the Border Patrol was also sacked. At the Los Angeles temple floor where migrants are given the option to turn themselves in to the Border Patrol, Genevieve Gonzalez has been working the phones all day trying to help them come home. "I have a cousin who is coming back from Florida right now to Baltimore. And they have a six
