The term "element", as used herein, refers to a population of individual elements or sub-elements that are communicatively coupled with each other. For example, in the design of a polyphase power source, a very often required element is the transformer. The transformers function to couple the polyphase power source with other systems. In particular, transformers function to couple a single phase of the polyphase power source with a polyphase power source. In a polyphase power system with an odd number of phases, three (3) phases is the minimum number of phases required for an effective phase-to-phase coupling. However, in the case where the polyphase power system has an even number of phases, two (2) phases would be more than sufficient and three phases would be a waste of the otherwise unused second phase. Therefore, in the case where the polyphase power system has an even number of phases, it is desirous to couple the unused phase with an auxiliary element. Thus, the ideal coupling of the polyphase power source with its auxiliary elements is accomplished through a transformer. The transformer which couples the single phase of the poly

At best, it was a semi-pale, semi-blanched version of a salad. Fortunately, you can't even go to a fancy event in a remote area of St. Lucia without a resident orchid smuggler popping up in the crowd. Those orchids are the main export of this island, and they are thriving on the plantain, cacao, and other assorted crops I haven't yet come to know much about. The orchids are, of course, all beautiful and green with garish blossoms that resemble black trash bags on white sticks. The pod is at the base of the flower and splits open in the evening, releasing the eggs that the mama orchid carries inside of her. They are dreary looking things, but somehow the red ferns and the white blossoms look surprisingly good together. The flowers are virtually identical to wild orchids that grow in calcareous rock formations in temperate areas. The only reason I was able to find them here is because I c9d1549cdd
