The implantable fluid restriction device is generally surgically implanted within a patient's body to reduce or limit the volume of fluid passing through the patient's capillary system. An example of an implantable fluid restriction device, which may be implanted within a patient's body, is a fluid restriction device having a generally Y-shaped configuration. Such a fluid restriction device is configured to be positioned adjacent to a patient's trachea to restrict the flow of fluids into the patient's body via the trachea. The fluid restriction device may be implanted in a patient's body to prevent or reduce complications that may be caused by fluid overload. The fluid restriction device may include an inflatable section configured to be inflatable from an unexpanded configuration to an expanded configuration and a one-way valve, which regulates the flow of fluid into the patient's body as the inflatable section inflates. The fluid restriction device may also include an elongated tubing configured to be positioned in a patient's trachea and to extend around a patient's neck. As a result, the fluid restriction device may be positioned to restrict the flow of fluids into the patient's body via the trachea, such that the amount of fluids passing into the patient's body is only as great as necessary to meet the patient's physiological needs. The fluid restriction device may be implanted in a patient's body after the patient's other fluid restriction devices, which are located in other areas of the patient's body, have already been removed, for example, by use of a laser beam, a scalpel, or other type of instrument. Due to the location of the inflatable section and the elongated tubing within the patient's body, the fluid restriction device may be secured to the patient's body using sutures and/or a tissue adhesive.
