invention relates to a novel form of hollow fiber and a novel process for the production of this fiber. In recent years, methods have been reported for preparing porous fibers which demonstrate marked efficiency in the transfer of gases. For example, U.S.
Pat. No. 4,418,110 discloses fibers having an open-cell core, wherein the hollow fibers have a highly efficient gas exchange capability. The fiber is said to comprise a woven fabric of glass fibers through which air is transferred through the fabric from one end to the other. The teachings of this patent are hereby incorporated herein by reference. U.S. Pat. No. 4,303,724 to A. R. Kraus et al discloses an air separation process for the production of oxygen enriched air or oxygen-enriched air at lean conditions (i.e. less than the saturation pressure for nitrogen) by use of a membrane. This membrane has a highly permeable zone which is permeable to oxygen and substantially impermeable to nitrogen and a dense, integral non-permeable zone surrounding the permeable zone. The dense non-permeable zone can contain various fibrous materials such as a non-woven fabric or a woven fabric. The fabrics can be prepared from any of a number of known binder materials, such as a resin binder, a thermosetting resin binder, a thermoplastic resin binder, a solvent-soluble binder or a water soluble binder. Furthermore, a number of auxiliary materials, such as fibers of glass, carbon, nylon, polypropylene, polyester, cellulose acetate, polyvinyl alcohol and polyvinylchloride, can be incorporated into the fibers.
