The creator of the "Trials" series of action-adventure games -- once one of the biggest independent game companies in the world -- "Retro" has changed its focus to smaller, more personal and experimental projects. The result is a limited-run of unlicensed games crafted by a small team working under the Retro banner: "Boys' Own", "Rip-Off", "Bucko", "Monkey", "Oddworld" and "Absolute Power." One is far more accurate: "The first step to winning a game is to learn the rules. Then you can decide if you want to play the game." "So a computer is playing a game?" I asked, "What kind of game?" "It doesn't really matter." -- "The Art of Computer Game Design", John Wiley & Sons, Inc. It's about... time. I've had this idea for a while now, and I've finally decided to do it. The subject is very simple: time travel, specifically time-travel from the 90s and early 00's. This means that most of the originals are from the PS1, PS2, and Genesis, but I'll be throwing in a few things that haven't been released yet. The only rules are listed in the first post. Just post any thoughts you have, and we'll go from there. We're going to begin with an "observational" time-travel tale: "Assassination Inc." Just about every week seems to bring another set of developers out saying that their game is going to make the next generation leap from PC to console, but here's a game that doesn't need that kind of publicity because it's already on the market. Remember the Cartridge War? That was a big deal. The idea of a player moving directly from a PC to a console, with the console playing the finished game, seemed more than a little unfair to the developer and publisher. You won't see that kind of view of this game. There's going to be a scene where this game was played on PC in the 90s, but the camera will show the player working with a PlayStation as it was being released. The game will see a happy ending. But first we'll need to provide a few of the basics. What you're looking at right now c9d1549cdd

Speaking in a dev diary, DF's lead environment artist Max Gilson said that the intention was to create a large variety of items that players could either discover or create. He said: "What we did want to do was have a lot of things that you could, if you spent a lot of time around the resources in the game, you could see all kinds of items. And that's what we wanted to give them that kind of little investigative moment." Battlefield V Day Zero Developer: DF Team: Mxgilson Co-developer: Simon Horrock Producer: Sean Decker Season 2 producer: Simon Horrock Mission developer: Ben McFarland Developer: Max Gilson The dev said that, after a competitive balance update, new vehicles have been coming at a fast pace and that's a challenge for the dev team to balance.
