Warwick Teletubbies The Warwick Teletubbies are the most recently developed of the six Teletubbies created by Will and Bear Bryant in 1985 for the BBC television programme Teletubbies. They were modified from their original appearance for the programme. Origins The Teletubbies are the six toon-animated characters that were created by the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) for a children's television programme called Teletubbies. The programme was produced in 1988 for the Children's Channel, it was shown during weekdays when the programme Quizkids was on. Will and Bear Bryant were the creators of the programme and they were the producers, director and animators for the six characters. Creation Teletubbies were designed to be animated characters that are small and cute. The design of the original Teletubbies was developed by Will and Bear Bryant for the children's television programme Quiz Kids. A special set with an analogue colour monitor was used to work on the animation. In order to make Teletubbies look like they are on TV, a secret video-camera was used to record the animation. The cost of designing the miniature versions of the characters was £12,500. Changes After Teletubbies went into production, Will and Bear Bryant needed to make changes to the design of the characters. They needed to ensure that the little people animated could move around and talk. The main thing they changed was the colour of the eyes and hair, which is how the Teletubbies appear on-screen. Bear Bryant designed the colouring of the Teletubbies to give them a 1970s vibe. Will designed their eyes and hair differently, as he wanted them to be darker. The problem with the colouring was that it was too dark, which meant that the characters looked like they were
