So, if we could make the brain start working again, we would simply save the cortex. And we would do that by injecting electrical signals into it. That way, we would get the brain back to a functional state just like it was before the accident. We think that it is possible to do something like that, but we are not completely sure if that is going to work. It is important to realise that although the brain can be saved, it cannot be repaired. So you would have to find a way to grow a new one. Q: You already mentioned that restoring a brain could be possible in 20-25 years. Do you also think that people's minds, personality traits and memories could be similarly restored? We feel that restoring the brain is one of the first things that we should try to do. Of course, it would also help to repair personality traits or memories. But they are not as easy to restore as the brain. You need to be a bit careful in bringing personality traits and memories back. That is because not everything in our minds is completely dependent on the brain. Our personalities are the product of many other things in addition to the brain. But we are not sure if the brain is the only factor responsible for what we consider to be personality. If a person had a stroke, we would say that they lost their personality, even though they would still have a brain. Q: Do you think that neuroscientists should try to find other "Miracles of Life"? For example, human clones or people with abilities that are extremely rare? So far, we haven't had any reason to think that such miracles really exist. They are most likely just stories that people tell each other to explain something that they don't fully understand. But I am not quite sure. It may be that we will find other miracles of life after we have more detailed knowledge of the human body. For example, we do not yet understand everything about the heart. It may be that we are quite naïve when it comes to that organ. We don't know for 595f342e71
