Ten full-term, near-normal, preterm neonates with unilateral cerebral palsy are reported. All children had either abnormal neurological examination or brain imaging, but seven showed abnormal values in only one or two of the following tests: head ultrasound, general neurological examination, postural stability, neonatal EEG and late blink reflex. The results of neurodevelopmental assessment at 2 years of age revealed that seven children with motor impairment were normal and one child was below normal. In both groups, degree of motor impairment and cognitive or psychomotor developmental scores were poorly related. The discrepancies between the findings of the neurodevelopmental examination and the postural stability, EEG, brainstem auditory evoked response and cranial MRI measurements appeared to be the most important findings. Children who showed signs of a behavioural disturbance during the neonatal phase had the worst prognosis. The game makes use of acceleration sensors, so the player can see the screen of the system running, and, as the user moves the phone, it is possible to see the screen changing. A system manager. But, I went anyway, because I'm a sucker like that and because the trailer blew me away. So, when I got home I booted the disc. The film starts with
