Therefore, a better understanding of host genetic and environmental factors that contribute to the risk for or the clinical outcome of infection would be useful. Feline dermatophytosis is a chronic skin disease that can affect tissues other than the skin; a genetic predisposition to immune dysfunction may render cats susceptible to developing other diseases. This review includes a description of the basic biology of the disease and a summary of research and field data supporting the significance of host variables in dermatophytosis. Maintaining proper skin hydration and optimal immune function of the host may be key factors in the occurrence and progression of dermatophytosis.
