Ask HN: Why is portable apps so fragmented? - kalium-xyz As a consumer I've noticed an extraordinary variability in the features, performance, and design of various portable applications. A few examples:- MS Word/Excel add-ins (created by the Office runtime team) are invariably extremely buggy. They work but they don't work well. Have you ever used them?- Google Keep, the note-taking tool, isn't supported by a large number of other apps or online services (take note).- Google Goggles, the image-recognition tool, doesn't work on the web.- Siri doesn't work on some of Apple's own apps.- Skype doesn't work on some of Microsoft's own apps. Do you even use it?Does anyone have any idea on why there's this fragmentation? Why are these apps so fragmented? What can be done about it? ===== benevol > why are these apps so fragmented? Probably because they're free and not locked to a single OS and platform, and they have a significant potential of being used by large user bases. > Why are these apps so fragmented? If they aren't made by the major players, they'd have a hard time to reach the epicenter of the market. It's very difficult to get to the top, and even then have a chance to stay there in a competitive market. > What can be done about it? My best shot: if there were more and better cross-platform programming languages it would help. Instead, we are stuck with some JavaScript-
