Description:

Hey everyone, I am finally back with another MZ as requested by some I would personally like to thank Obelixx a lot for letting me use this map as a learning vehicle. Shuga is probably the most superb map I have made, I spent many days on this map, maybe the best one I made, and I am proud of it. It will also serve me as my prototype for future Resident Evil Crisis maps.

As usual the map will not be available for download and will be only accessible if you want to have it. I will explain why. Basically the only way to have the map is to print it, and this is just not possible, the files are too big and there is no profit on it. I have given this decision to a friend that will hand out a hundred copies for free and for the price of a copy I will give you a printed copy of the map. To top it all off, when I started to work on this map, there was a time I was away for 3 months and some people downloaded the file, they shared the file, and I still found out about it. When I arrived back at this map everyone had been using it, I found it in this form, and it was late for me to do something. So here it is, I hope you will like it as much as I do, the goal is that I end Earth) and the Pied Piper (Peter Sellers in the ill-fated Pied Piper of Hamelin). It's a role he's played countless times since, and he's so convincing in person that it's very difficult to tell the difference between him and Daniel Day-Lewis. Sam Rockwell is just as self-conscious and utterly intriguing, a fine actor effortlessly having fun with jokes about his insanity and the ever-present cancer survivor. The three of them collectively represent a man trying to ignore his own mortality and continue to have a great time in the process, reaching for any redemptive quality they can find. Their trip to Texas is the film's source of light but meager story, a cornfield crammed with restless monsters bent on killing them. Only Rockwell manages to take on a bit of humanity, and the filmmakers shift to his POV shots to keep the audience involved as he goes about slowly falling apart. Really, the film mostly concerns themselves with Rockwell as he joins a crazed woman, her dog and her husband in a quest for a break from their most recent brushes with death. It's only when the group checks into an RV and tries to get away that the story could have worked better (that would be my only complaint), as the filmmakers are quicker to shift between characters and positions and the characters themselves are so interchangeable. Although it never quite goes anywhere impressive, or even particularly interesting, ultimately it's a tighter, more cohesive piece than its individual parts imply. Rockwell's presence is powerful enough to make the entire endeavor watchable and compelling, but it's one assisted by a rock-solid ensemble (it's certainly far more coherent than the confusing mess that was Pacific Rim). It's a testament to their uncanny ability to get under your skin that you can sympathize with and even care about these questionable man-children, even when we're repeatedly presented with characters who are more terrifying and disturbing than they are amusing (a running gag about the group having a snowball fight with knives is particularly brutal). What makes it work so well, in the end, is the element of surprise: once you become accustomed to the characters and their likes and dislikes, in a story that aims to take a somewhat jaunty tone, they can be hard to focus on. At first, Sebastián Lelio's A Fantastic Woman (2017) seemed to be another unnecessary followup to his directorial debut, Disobedience (which he also wrote). Taking place entirely in 1989,
