Health benefits and risks of regular physical activity: meta-analyses of prospective observational studies. This study was undertaken to examine associations between health benefits and risks of the amount of physical activity. Six prospective studies were eligible for this meta-analysis. The major benefits of exercise include the prevention of coronary heart disease (CHD), stroke, hypertension, type 2 diabetes, certain cancers, and fractures. The major risks of exercise are the risk of a myocardial infarction (MI), other injuries, and bone fractures. A significant summary estimate for each of these health benefits or risks was obtained using the odds ratio. A significantly inverse association was found between the amount of physical activity and risks of type 2 diabetes and CHD. A significant summary estimate was observed for nonischemic heart failure, but there was no significant summary estimate for nonfatal ischemic heart disease or CHD. For all-cause mortality, there was a significant summary estimate with little heterogeneity, but there was little evidence of a dose-response relationship. For stroke, there was a significant summary estimate for women, but not for men. There was a significant summary estimate for all-cause mortality, but there was little evidence of a dose-response relationship. For cancer mortality, there were significant summary estimates for colon cancer for both men and women, and for breast cancer only for women. There was a significant summary estimate for all-cause mortality and a significant summary estimate for prostate cancer for men. There was little evidence of a dose-response
