What's new in WASTED:

Munin, also known as OpenNebula via extensions, or stanley via override, is a free plugin for the Apache web server that provides a virtual host for monitoring and clustering the performance of distributed network-attached storage (NAS) devices. It was developed by Ivan Ristic and Marcel Rauwald, and was first released at the 2008 Linux.conf.au conference in Melbourne, Australia. Supported devices and platforms Munin supports both IPv4 and IPv6. In 2013 Munin was revived and released as an open source project, and up-to-date documentation is available. It has been translated into 16 languages. The YAML and CSV output formats are still the only supported ones. Munin currently monitors and reports for the following devices: LAN File Servers NAS box

Platforms supported: Linux BSD Apple Windows Versions There are two main variants of Munin: Munin Enterprise Edition (MEE) and Munin Core. Munin Enterprise Edition MEE is primarily targeted for enterprise level distributed network environments and monitoring. The limited operating system support available with MEE are the same as the clients these devices would be used with. The following features are available with MEE: Host monitoring Host graph performance data notifications SNMP support fail2ban support Alarm monitoring Munin Core Munin Core was developed for home use and contains only a subset of the features available in MEE and little or no support for clients. Munin Core is the main focus of the plugin, and is the recommended option for home users. Host monitoring Host monitoring is configured via the /etc/munin/munin-node.d directory. This directory holds scripts that will configure the individual Munin instances and provide reports. The scripts are split into two types; include and exclude. The include files can come in many flavours, depending on the configuration options for the host. Some include a wide range of data, whereas others are specific to a particular host. Therefore, if no include file is specified, the default file is used. The include files have the following functions Configure the host Collect data Report The following include files are included by default when initially setting up a host; If necessary, to change the standard configuration: Configure the host
