A: You can clean up your source by implementing a row-vs-column approach for your coding structure (RVC in short). The short story is that you should have a separate directory for your classes and another for your properties, then you can open and close a folder when required. Also, try to use a better control structure so that your code is better readable and optimizes for maintenance. Sidenote: Don't use the `<pre>` tag: it's not supported by all browsers and makes your code sensitive to whitespace, not only with regards to formatting but also readability. So your classes should contain something like `public class NiceGuy { private String name; //`
