Q: Github set repository status on branches I want to be able to set a repository status so that anyone can see what branch status is on a pull request in Github. Basically, I'd like to set a repository status that states: "base branch merged into master branch". How can I do this? A: If you're talking about the issue label, then you can use the following workflow: Open the pull request in the web interface of the repository in question. Make sure it's open, but not merged or closed. In the pull request comments, leave a comment saying "Merged into master" This will automatically create a commit that will label the pull request as merged into master in the future.

Earlier this year, the cryptocurrency experienced a massive growth as over $2 billion worth of Dash was mined. With an exchange price currently around $900, Dash is currently the cheapest way to invest. To mitigate the risk of investing in Dash, you can buy a bitcoin wallet so that you can store your Dash while waiting for its price to increase. If you'd rather avoid the centralization of Dash being controlled by a single organization, you can invest in Dash's DAC. This will allow you to split the organization's power with other investors. You can also fund a development of Dash's project. When you start adding Dash to your portfolio, you'll see it grow in value much faster. You'll also be able to invest in these funds during ICOs.
