The Photoshop Bible This book is filled with tutorials and tips. Each topic is well covered and clearly explained. See the table of contents for details. # Chapter 1: Getting to Know Photoshop The very first thing you need to know about Photoshop, even before opening the program, is how to save a copy of your work. This chapter addresses this, as well as the software's basic features. # Saving Files The first step in any creative endeavor is to make sure that your work is saved every time that you make it. This saves all of your work from one session to the next. The name given to this is saving, but the process is more formalized as saving as or saving as a file. ## Saving as a File If you are working on a local computer, saving in Photoshop is as simple as pressing Ctrl+S or clicking File⇒Save and making sure that the correct file format is used; see the "New File Type" sidebar on the next page for the list of file formats. If you are working on a networked computer, the process is slightly more complicated and requires that you take steps to ensure that your work is being saved as a file so that it can be retrieved in the future. If your computer is set up with a document manager (such as a folder system or network server), you can just save your work directly into that folder, which is essentially saving it as a file. If you are working on a networked computer, you can be even more secure and ensure that your work is saved by using remote desktop to access the computer, as described in Chapter 8.

Q: Need explanation on why OpenSSH ignoring SSH Agent if hostkey is specified In the code below, in order for the agent to be used, the output has to be compressed to be written to a file (with key_write). If the file output is not compressed, then the line `std::string output = std::string("SSH-2.0-OpenSSH_5.2 ");` doesn't work (some helper methods require input to be a string). If I omit this line (as with `std::string("SSH-2.0-OpenSSH_5.3 ");`), then the agent doesn't work. Why is this? If the file output is compressed, why does it even matter how high version it is? NOTE: Right now, I have done two trials by removing the compression (just by outputting the line in the original un-compressed version). The code works both times when removing the compression. `#include #include #include #include #include #include #include #include` using namespace std; int main(int argc, const char * argv[]) { //... if (argc > key) { key_write(key, output);

On Sept. 6, President Trump will make his first formal State of the Union address to a joint session of Congress, giving his final address to the nation before midterm elections. His speech is expected to carry a full day's worth of fodder for the political media. But the speeches over the last several years should provide a baseline for how he sounds and what he'll say. Although Trump tends to use unpredictable language, his speeches over the last three years follow a similar structure. He goes into some history, he says something positive (or at least noncontroversial), he says something critical of his opponents, he holds up a hypothetical image of a win and offers some policy detail on his priorities. These are a few of the key themes of his speeches over the last few years: THE RUBBER-STAMPING MOMENT Trump has traditionally introduced himself to the public by declaring his candidacy as a movement, rather than a person. But once Trump officially became the nominee of the Republican Party, he started to speak more as president, and less as a candidate. In the next few months of 2016, Trump used some of the same themes to introduce himself to the country as the Republican nominee. In the final days before the November election, Trump introduced himself as "the only candidate who will make America great again." This victory mantra was a sticking point for many Americans, and what inspired Trump to deliver one of the most memorable State of the Union addresses of all time. In the 2016 address, Trump declared, "This will be the moment when the fate of the Republic will be decided." In 2017 and 2018, it was more of the same. He often said things like "we will begin renegotiating NAFTA, on terms that will be fair and reciprocal." In 2019, though, Trump seemed to change the rhetoric. In his State of the Union speech, he used the phrase "America First." Trump's responses to trade policy questions in the State of the Union were also much more aggressive, and more in line with the rhetoric he delivered in 2017 and 2018. THE STILL-OPEN ISSUE OF FOREIGN POLICY Trump's views on foreign policy have always been muddled. With few exceptions — especially after the election — Trump has relied on his secretaries of State and Defense to provide his foreign policy voice. In his
