The present invention is directed to a loading device for a vehicle which comprises a frame having rollers which are in contact with a loading surface and which move in the direction of movement of the vehicle. A hydraulic cylinder is positioned in the frame and has a first piston at the free end of the cylinder, which piston is connected with the frame. A second piston is provided, which piston is connected with the loading surface. The second piston is movable in a second cylinder. When the first piston is deflected, pressurized fluid is supplied to the second cylinder, thereby moving the second piston. A loading device of this type is known, for example, from DE 37 37 174 C2. A load carrier is provided here by which the loading device can be loaded onto a vehicle. It is a disadvantage of the known loading device that an additional cylinder is required in order to drive the second piston for loading the loading surface. This leads to the additional disadvantage that, during loading, the second piston is connected with the vehicle. It is, therefore, possible to only load the loading surface by manual labor, which is labor-intensive. It is also disadvantageous in this connection that, during loading, the hydraulic cylinders are not in parallel to the loading surface. This leads to the fact that, when the pressure in the hydraulic cylinders is increased, the driven surface coupled with the second piston is positioned higher than the driving surface and the loading surface. This can lead to drawbacks in the ability to load with automatic equipment, such as for example, a folding loading mechanism. The present invention is, therefore, directed to the task of developing a loading device of the type initially mentioned by such a way that problems can be avoided, which arise in the context of automatic loading. This task is inventively solved in that the second piston is also connected
