More specifically, the invention relates to systems that print remotely from a wireless remote interface. It is known in the prior art to form a printed image on a surface, using a printer with an ink jet printhead. It is also known in the prior art to send print commands from a computer to the printer and, using information in the print commands, for the printer to control its operation. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 6,347,033, entitled xe2x80x9cMethod and Apparatus for

Automatically Positioning a Printhead for Printing,xe2x80x9d issued Jan. 8, 2002 to Reuss et al. teaches that an ink jet printhead is integrated into the carriage of a printer. The print head moves laterally back and forth along a platen as it prints. A print command instructs the printhead to print a predetermined pattern in a different location on the paper. The printer, which is linked to the computer, sends the print command to the printhead, and the printer determines the location of the printhead on the paper surface and the printhead thereafter prints the pattern. However, there is a need for printers that are more mobile than printers that are integrated into a carriage. Remote printers are generally less expensive, more portable, and easier to use than those that are incorporated into a carriage. In addition, remote printers are more easily set up and configured. Furthermore, remote printers are typically linked to computers by a wireless link, such as infrared communications. Computer data may be transferred to the printer via the wireless link, and the computer data typically includes text-based commands. Sometimes, as in the print command of the ""033 patent, a graphics image is also transferred to the printer. In order for the printer to be used for high quality printing, the print quality of the printer needs to be enhanced. It is known that both the 6d1f23a050
