Ca²⁺-sensitive inactivation of a voltage-dependent K⁺ channel in the central nervous system. The gating and inactivation properties of a K⁺ channel from the central nervous system were studied on in vitro membrane patches excised from the cultured mouse spinal cord. As it was observed in other excitable cells, the channel was activated by depolarization and was inhibited by intracellular cAMP. The channel inactivation was greatly enhanced by a prolonged depolarization to a level just below the resting potential. This effect was abolished by 1,2-bis(2-aminophenoxy)ethane-N,N',N'-tetraacetic acid or the intracellular application of 8-(N,N-dimethylamino)octyl-3,4,5-trimethoxybenzoate.
