Multiple randomized trials have demonstrated the efficacy of electroconvulsive therapy (ECT) and repetitive transcranial magnetic stimulation (rTMS) in the short term treatment of major depressive disorders. The goal of this systematic review is to analyze the pharmacokinetic and pharmacodynamic profiles of ECT and rTMS during short-term treatment for mood disorders. The review identifies studies reporting on antidepressant pharmacokinetic and pharmacodynamic effects of ECT and rTMS and identifies the characteristics of these effect studies. A literature search was conducted (up to May 2010) using PubMed, MEDLINE, EMBASE, the Cochrane Library and the Web of Science to identify relevant studies reporting on pharmacokinetic and pharmacodynamic effects of ECT and rTMS in humans. Among all treatment options used for the management of depression, ECT and rTMS produce the largest treatment effect within the shortest time period. Whereas ECT is associated with hemodynamic changes and other side effects, rT
