Our conclusion that the plaintiff failed to establish the existence of this necessary element of his defense turns in part on the reasoning used by the district court to deny the defendant's motion for summary judgment. The court's decision was based on its finding that "there is a material dispute of fact regarding whether the defendant's provision of the products for the classroom project within the [contract] definition of products, as opposed to services, was a breach of contract." 2 The plaintiff sought damages against the individual defendants in the amount of $1,220,000, whereas the defendant seeks protection from claims for $1,320,000. The plaintiff has not appealed the district court's summary judgment for the individual defendants 3 At the time of the alleged breach, the appellant's position was that services for the class project were incorporated into the contract, despite the fact that the contract defined "products" to include "products... purchased by the [defendant] under contract...." The district court found that
