Rethinking the role of brain biochemistry in anxiety disorders: the emerging importance of hippocampal dysfunction. This paper will review and discuss the relevance of the hippocampus in anxiety and stress. We start with a brief review of the neural structures of the hippocampus and related limbic system. Next, we will describe how the hippocampus plays a key role in regulating the emotional and physiological responses to stress. Finally, we will consider the implications of dysfunctional hippocampal functions in anxiety disorders. We conclude that the hippocampus plays a critical role in anxiety, stress and mood disorders. The hippocampus and related structures of the limbic system are important in the physiology of emotion. In humans, as well as in non-human animals, the hippocampus is involved in emotion and in stress reactivity. In addition, chronic stress leads to degeneration of the hippocampus and related limbic structures, and to the development of anxiety and mood disorders. On the basis of this evidence, we propose that the hippocampus may play a key role in the pathogenesis of anxiety, and that individuals with anxiety disorders may be characterized by the presence of vulnerability factors that promote a dysregulation of the hippocampal system. We also propose that pharmacological interventions aimed at increasing serotonergic neurotransmission in the hippocampus and related limbic structures may be beneficial in the treatment of anxiety disorders.
