first we start the design process by creating the various blocks on the screen and clicking on them individually where we need, then click and drag the blocks to where we want them in the design. as a design grows, and the graphical possibilities become more and more limited, the editors can be pushed to their limits and beyond. but at the same time, we can extend our logical thinking beyond the limits of physical reality. as our imagination grows, so does our design, and the ultimate is imagination. now that the garment is cut out, we can fit, stitch, draft and manage the fit in stitches and rows. this sub-program is where the real magic of the software comes into play. we can fit the garment in stitches and rows, add a new stitch or row for any change in the design, and even move parts around the garment that require it. all of this is done with the push of a few buttons. but it doesnt end there. i can also edit my stitch and row sizes either by using the software or through the software or even by looking up the relevant information on the internet at my leisure. the sizes that the software shows in the editor is just an indication of what the final size of the garment will be. like any calculation based on a shape, it is only a guideline. once the file is exported and saved as a file, we can send it on to anyone we like, if we live within the realms of the internet. at the moment we are still within the realms of the internet. if we do not like the designs that are already out there, we can always tweak the design a little and submit our fresh design to the world. or not.
