Basic physics of laser-tissue interactions have been combined with medical techniques to deliver a new class of therapies. Many reports are now available where laser therapy has been used to selectively destroy or coagulate tumor tissue within a patient, thereby abrogating the need for surgical resection. Unfortunately, these promising results are substantially dependent on the accuracy with which tissue can be visualized, targeted and controlled. A major advance for the future will be the development of a high-power/high-dose system which could deliver an energy to a tumor over prolonged periods of time. This technology would result in greatly reduced treatment times, since the destruction of a tumor could be accomplished over a few hours rather than over days, and also would potentially result in the complete elimination of viable tumor tissue. Laser therapy is considered to be complementary to, and to some degree a subset of, other forms of local cancer treatment which are currently being utilized. These include surgery, chemo and radiation therapy.Q: iPad retina display optimization Is there any use in using retina display for a view hierarchy created programmatically in a UIViewController. e.g - self.view = [[UIImageView alloc] initWithImage:[UIImage imageNamed:@"image.png"]]; I am creating a view with initWithImage method and assigning it to the main view of my view controller. Should I create another UIViewController and use an image with 2x size for this view and then add it to the main view? Or is there some optimization I can achieve with the image I am using now? A: The reason you'd want to do it is that you want to specify the retina display in your Interface Builder, but not have to do it in code. This is a tricky deal. You can specify the number of lines that make up a view in IB, which will scale automatically for a retina display. It's the contents that aren't going to scale which you need to look at. So if a full-sized image is to be displayed, you don't want to be having to resize images to 2x. Having said that, I tend to use images created in Photoshop (with a bitmap .png extension) because I'm used to scaling, so Photoshop will scale it for you. If I need to do it in code, I use the UIImage method drawWithRect: in UIImageView (with a fill color to make it look good). You won't be able to tell from the UIImage how it scaled the image. See: How should I create/load images for my iPad app? Rubio laughed. "Do you consider FOX News a legitimate news source for you?" Napolitano asked.
