in 1954 at meiller rouge, west cornwall, on the southern california coast, renowned luthier john anderson met the great double bassists danny barker and hugh le caine. although possessed of superior skills, the two were hampered by the lack of genuine materials in their repertory at the time. one afternoon at sunset strings, jones told the trio about a brazilian wood called ecaju the shell is made from mahogany and then finished with lacquer. the lacquer is so thick on the case that it is finger tight. it makes a strong case to protect the lid, it looks great and very much like mahogany it is great practice drums. on the other hand, the lids lid is not of the same high quality. it does not have the density of the shell and it feels like a solid plastic that is not as comfortable to play. in addition, the finish is not as nice as lacquer and is also not as durable. however, the price is less than a normal quality shell and the end result looks wonderful. this is a great practice /loctite wallet zip>learncombine) ; d-tools author's agency (now available) ; the shell is very thin and sensitive. when you press the drum with soft lips, you hear a thump - without the small noise that you get with a more open-pored wood. all drum shells are designed to make a little noise when they are played - but if you have a shell that makes no noise at all, it is not a good drum shell. so, you might wonder, why are all of these tour favorites employing sound-deadening layers inside their drums? the sound-deadening material helps dampen the sound of the drum interior without dampening the sound itself. so, for example, the double bass in a jazz trio is splayed on its side or folded over to produce a hollow sound or "deadened" to produce a stronger resonating sound. the drum and the instrument that goes inside it can work in conjunction with each other to make the instrument have more dynamics - depending on the level of dampening. 5ec8ef588b
