mass. The application of NPs to the surface of the silica template may result in an overall increase in the degree of crosslinking between the particle and the template. These changes can result in a silica-NP composite that is more or less dense than the original porous structure of the template, the degree of crosslinking of which is controlled by the process of template removal. It is also necessary to separate the composite from the template. In the current invention, a non-uniform, rapidly expanding layer of air is formed around the template, which expands to fill the pores of the template. With the expansion of the air, the template particles, along with any template or silica-NP composite that remains bonded to the particles, are expelled into the rapidly expanding layer of air. This process may be referred to as flow. The expanding air rapidly forces the NP material through the pore structure of the template, which results in the separation of the composite from the template, while the template is substantially retained within the air layer. The non-uniform air layer, the formation of which is controlled by the rate at which the expanding layer of air moves to fill the pores of the template, causes a layer of the
