You can hide even more than that. I have a few particularly photosensitive family members who are small children, and my parents have several grandchildren. I never want to know where they go when they run out the door or turn on their electronic toys. Neither do they. But we all use the same proxy server, and the server allows Mozilla Firefox and Chrome to keep track of our web browsing. If you use the same proxy, naturally, it can see all of your communication. I unplugged my iMac from its Thunderbolt hub, which is used for Ethernet and using the keyboard. I unplugged my Mac Mini just to see if it would run. Both computers were fine. I unplugged a Windows 10 notebook from its power supply, and still it ran. I unplugged a hard drive from its Mac in one case, plugged it in its Mac in another, and the Mac did not panic. In fact, it told me later that the drive was disconnected and then connected again. I've disabled all network connections in recent macOS Sierra besides my iPhone's data connection. I have a few network shares that I want to preserve only with my iPhone, and I want to keep my personal server network shares separate. I have a legacy print server I use sporadically. I've installed apps on my Mac using an encrypted package that didn't ask me where I was installing it. Despite my precautions, the installer asked for Adobe's personal identity, and I had to link it to my account at that site. Perhaps the best thing I can suggest is to be very careful from now on about what you're installing, especially if you're on a Mac. Android and iPad apps are different in this regard: they don't ask you. But a package file is actually a folder on your Mac's hard drive, not a file, so it's easy enough to just drag and drop it.
