The faster one have a certain speed in a certain time. And the other one has infinite speed in a certain time. So, I assume that if the bodies collide, they both move to infinity after collision. And if the bodies collide, they recede to the fixed planet in infinite times. Is that true? A: I assume that if the bodies collide, they both move to infinity after collision. You assume correctly. If you continue, you can think that if the two bodies are of the same mass and the relative velocity is zero, no energy is conserved. We may imagine a kind of "reaction" in which the bodies would either have to slow down because of the increased gravitational attraction to the other, or speed up. And if the bodies collide, they recede to the fixed planet in infinite times. You assume correctly again. Is that true? It depends on the mass of the bodies and the velocity relative to the planet. If the bodies are large, the collision gives a large amount of kinetic energy to the system. Their relative velocity to the planet will slow down and they will move with finite distance to the planet. If the bodies are small, they lose a small amount of kinetic energy to the system. They move back to infinity after the collision. The bodies may or may not have enough energy to speed up again. This means that if they are small, they will come back to infinity, and if they are large, they will slow down to the point where the angular momentum of the system is conserved.
