Iatrogenic cardiac events can be attributed to the presence of toxic metals or to the presence of electrical interfaces that can activate adjacent tissue. The use of electrical stimulation as an alternative to drugs for the treatment of cardiac conditions has not been adequately explored. In this study, the benefits of electrical stimulation were evaluated in animals with chronic myocardial infarction (MI) and the reversibility of those benefits evaluated in animals that had undergone coronary artery bypass surgery. A polyimide-coated electrical interface was surgically implanted into the ventricle of 10 animals with chronic MI, and the recovery of ventricular function assessed 3 weeks later. In comparison, six animals with chronic MI were implanted with a nonpolyimide-coated electrical interface (control group), and the effects on heart function were measured 1 week later. The cardiac effects of electrical stimulation in acute models were also evaluated. Six animals with chronic MI and four with bypass surgery had the polyimide-coated electrical interface surgically implanted. Three weeks later, the animals with chronic MI showed a significant improvement in left ventricular function ($22 \pm 1.1\%$ vs $13.1 \pm 2.2\%$ in the control group, $P = .02$). The improvement in ventricular function in the animals with chronic MI was associated with a significant reduction in LV end-diastolic pressure (10.2 ± 1.3 vs 15.5 ± 2.6 mm Hg in the control group, $P = .02$). The improvement in ventricular function was associated with a significantly lower LV end-systolic pressure (6.7 ± 0.8 vs 11.6 ± 1.6 mm Hg in the control group, $P = .02$). In contrast, the animals with bypass surgery
