Atypical radiologic presentation of pancreatic mucinous cystadenocarcinoma: case report. Mucinous cystadenocarcinoma of the pancreas is a rare neoplasm. The cytologic picture of mucinous cystadenocarcinoma on fine needle aspiration biopsy is rarely shown in the literature. The smears from this case presented with distinct architectural atypia, multilayering, and cytological grading without noticeable secretory activity. The diagnosis was confirmed on surgical resection. Atypical presentation of this neoplasm on cytology highlights the importance of careful evaluation of cytologic smears with attention to architectural and cytological atypia. Computerized medical history information is widely used for purposes of patient scheduling, insurance claims, clinical consultation, and research. The advent of the World Wide Web has accelerated the delivery of patient-generated medical history information. The World Wide Web is the Internet's multimedia information retrieval system. A web site is a server or servers that store data in the form of web pages that can be retrieved, formatted, and displayed on a user's web browser. Electronic medical records ("EMR") are sometimes used to store patient-generated medical history information. These EMR are common in emergency rooms and hospital settings. Patients may be given a paper-based form to complete that includes a header and sections in which they may provide a text description, a long text narrative, and open-ended or checkbox questions for both text-based information and for data fields, such as diagnoses, surgical procedures, laboratory results, etc. These forms are later reviewed by nurses, physicians, and other healthcare professionals. These EMR-based forms can allow patients to share with their providers any information they wish, but they typically include data entry, require patient transcription of narrative or interview information, and generally are not 79a2804d6b
