Pros:

- The entire image you click on is highlighted. (Drop the whole image into Photoshop and you can't ever see image elements you've closed or hidden—you have to drag everything out of Photoshop to see it.)
- You can close those bits that have been hidden.
- You can bring those closed or hidden areas back to Photoshop, by hitting the pre-set buttons.
- You can even use a tool to combine separate images into one large image if you've got a big pane of glass.
- The "slide show" of your images is visible at all times. Just click through them, as you would in a slide show.
- A visual display of the "painting" you're creating also keeps you current on just how that's going.
- Users can use the "painting" to "lock in" different sizes or lookpoints for framing. When the importing of multiple images is over, you can offer your customer a listing of all the images you want them to select, and the user doesn't need to worry about overlaps or wrong selections.

All these features are part of the more than $1,000 Photoshop update that's been in the works for more than two years. "We've been pushing very hard to get to the 2019 release while listening to you and addressing your ideas," said Yoshida in a video posted to YouTube. The first question to ask yourself is what do you like to edit and how are you going to edit it. Whether you do a lot of adjustments or you are mostly a photographer. Photoshop is only software when it is used the right way. You can use all the tools for quick jobs or split them into different folder for custom settings.
