Type and DataType can be either 'object' or 'array'. Class looks like the following template class Data { public: Data(); ~Data(); void Element(const Type&, const DataType&); Type get() const; void set(const Type&, const DataType&); void Empty(const Type&, const DataType&); Data& operator=(const Data&); }; Then I'm adding some methods to construct instances of this class (example for array): template Data::Data() { Type val = 0; DataType ety = DataType(); Element(val, ety); } This works perfectly and I can use this class for any data type. However I would like to add methods for explicit construction of array where I would not want to use a default constructor for DataType. I added following method to the class: template Data::Data(const Type& val, const DataType& ety) { Empty(val, ety); Element(val, ety); } This method works fine for arrays but if we try to use this for object we get following error: error: no matching function for call to Data >::Data(const double, std::__cxx11::basic_string&) { val
