Are there magnets that can control laser beams? It could be interesting to have a magnet that could control the power of the laser beam. I know there are radio waves that are controlled by magnetism, so the answer could be "yes" to this question. A: There are experimental demonstrations of magnetophotonic control of laser beams: Magnetic fields are produced by the current in an electromagnetic coil, a current that itself is induced by the movement of a magnet. A laser can be coupled to a photodetector that is sensitive to the local change in the intensity of the laser light caused by the motion of a magnet close to the detector. The paper 'Zooming and tracking of a laser beam with a rotating magnet' by K. O'Connell and S. L. Roser (Optics Letters 29 (2004) 2721-2723) is a typical example in this direction. The focus of that paper is magnetic capture of the light produced by axially symmetric, rotating biconvex lenses (KBHAR) and the consequent scalar imaging. The common technique to make this possible is the use of a Michelson interferometer with two slits to detect the frequency spectrum of the light diffracted by the KBHAR. Hong Kong-Shenzhen Railway The Hong Kong-Shenzhen Railway (HKSR) is a 446 km. (272 mi.) railway in Hong Kong and in the Chinese province of Guangdong. It connects the western and eastern parts of the New Territories on the west coast of Hong Kong Island, via the border town of Shenzhen. The construction of the railway was initiated in 1993, and the line officially opened on 13 January 1997. The line was built by the Hong Kong government and Shenzhen and Guangdong governments. The railway is built on reclaimed land, a few kilometres inland from the coast. The line, along with the MTR's West Rail Line, was built as a feeder to the West
