Thermal behaviour of a synthetic bio-based monoglyceride: a calorimetric study. Thermodynamic properties were studied for the major component of a thermally treated (60-300°C) and glycerol-derived supercritical fluid (SCF) system. On one hand, the effects of temperature, time and the SCF type on the thermodynamic properties of the system were examined. On the other hand, the energy flow associated with the thermal reaction was evaluated by a reaction coordinate approach and the Gibbs free energy surface was described in terms of coordinate and system variables. The SCF type (with or without pressure), as well as the increase in temperature and time, led to considerable changes in the thermodynamic behaviour of the synthetic glycerol-based monoglyceride. Although the temperature dependence of the enthalpy-entropy compensation was observed with both SCF types, the two SCF types operated with different transition temperatures (161°C vs. 239°C, without and with pressure, respectively). Both the enthalpy and entropy compensation, as well as the heat capacity, were influenced by the SCF. Both the enthalpy and entropy compensation correlated well with the reaction coordinate, revealing an unimolecular decomposition process.

Q: Determine the value of  $\sum_{n=2}^{\infty} \frac{H_n}{n}$  I have to determine the following:  $\sum_{n=2}^{\infty}$
