An audiological and clinical point of view. Tinnitus is an auditory condition, characterized by the perception of sound when no external source is present. Hearing loss is also a clinical sign described by a perceived threshold below normal for a given individual, and by the absence of sounds in this range. Hearing loss and tinnitus frequently co-occur in the general population, and this is common in otological disorders. Tinnitus could be a symptom of any disorder involving inner ear, but this is controversial. The goal of this paper is to demonstrate that both tinnitus and hearing loss can be considered as a single condition within the general audiological concept of a disease. We reviewed the current literature regarding this issue and analyzed the clinical and audiological data of tinnitus in order to better define its classification and its origin. The internal ear is located within the temporal bone of the skull and communicates by a chain of hair cells with the auditory nerve. Although structures of the inner ear can be affected by a number of causes, in most cases hearing impairment and tinnitus have several common characteristics. Hearing loss and tinnitus have common pathophysiological aspects; in particular, they seem to be associated with the same mechanisms such as the cochlea and auditory cortex. For this reason, tinnitus could be regarded as a symptom in a wider spectrum of the inner ear disorders. Most of these inner ear disorders are benign, meaning that tinnitus is not a rare symptom of significant clinical value and usually does not require a specific treatment.Coastal Elevation Control Plan Draft A Coastal Elevation Control PlanFor South Staffordshire Area 18/23/23 B/D Brief description This Policy is in support of a cross section of coastal engineering actions that may
