One of the most notable features in Photoshop CS6 is Lightroom's integration with Adobe's cloud. Here, images are transferred to Adobe's servers where they can be accessed by Lightroom and Photoshop. Besides images from the Creative Cloud, your Lightroom purchased collection is also accessible. In effect, this means that you can pick up the latest images anywhere, even when you do not have a copy of Lightroom and want to apply an appropriate filter. To be perfectly honest, this integration does not really make sense in Lightroom 5 since the tool features are already included in Photoshop; your collection is after all a Photoshop library. However, the cloud integration has been available to Lightroom and Photoshop since the release of CS6. In Lightroom CS6, the system resources are managed quite well, as you can see in the task manager. As soon as you have located the Lightroom process, you can kill it by clicking the small x, or remove the application from your system by going to the Spotlight pane and removing the application. The Photoshop CS6 update offers a wide array of possibilities. For starters, some brand-new effects provide new ways of handling images. One such example is the Glowing (a.k.a. Neon) objects. They provide a very casual, friendly way to portray an image. Of course, this is only available in full-featured mode. The remaining new features can be found in the Dynamic Previews. There, the B/W effect, the Displacement Filter, and the new Art Generator offer a versatile set of possibilities.

As you'll see below, Lightroom vs Photoshop is less a question of which is best but more a question of what you want to do. They have different purposes and for many photographers and editors it's not a question fo either or – they use both but at different stages of their editing process.
