In my mind the biggest improvement in Lightroom 5, by far, is the new development interface. I spent a bit of time with it using two tasks and it seems to be a lot better than Lightroom 4. The tasks are:

- Cloner/Clone. This is the process of duplicating the files and your image settings. If you want to see exactly what a cloned file will look like before you make a change, go to the Lightroom window with the cloned file, then click to "Edit camera capture settings". That's all there is to it. Source files can grow to be hundreds of megabytes (and in my experience do.)
- Develop. This lets you select multiple unnamed image files. Lightroom opens them all and allows you to edit all of them in the same way, using the same selection tools. This is a very slick workflow for working with images.

Lightroom 5.1 was released earlier this month. The biggest news with this release is the Photoshop version. Photoshops have seen a drastic change with a new file load and a complete file save and load system. You can now reopen a document and those changes (like layers) will be there, so you just need to work on the new document with the new updates. With the release of Photoshop CC 2015.1 they re-did the way the whole system is handling the files. When you reopen a document it opens at the current working state and saves any new changes. This means there is no need to save/load the whole file anymore, you just need to save if you want to take your project/document to another state. You are also able to see the new changes inline with the old layer/compass/blend etc.
