If you're a "memory keeper," then you've probably heard term "graphic autopsy." A graphic autopsy is a systematic, scientific method, which allows you to accurately determine the demographics of a given audience via the results of any given project. These audits are used to determine the characteristics of your target market. In a graphic autopsy, you'll seek to determine what your audience likes, dislikes, how they communicate, how they move, things they have in common, and so forth. Graphic autopsies also help uncover communication barriers, such as language barriers that complicate translation. It's a great way to assess industry-specific biases and irregularities. It's also a great technique for discovering what psychological biases or industry-specific characteristics may exist in your potential clients. Did they say "no" because they heard it from their mother's or father's business? Possible, right? I wouldn't be surprised if something like that happened. Much of marketing is based on weak and unreliable assumptions, but the results of a proper graphic autopsy will tell you how strong your assumptions are. Graphic autopsies can also be used to find problems with your content, bugs, and design flaws. When you work as a digital nomad, it is essential for you to find freelance work. You will use a graphic autopsy to find work that will fit your criteria. Here is my template for a graphic autopsyin Adobe InDesign.
