Field of the Invention The invention relates generally to a method and apparatus for the detection of the absolute position of a data bus, and, more particularly, to the detection of the absolute position of a serial data bus without the requirement of a reference signal or other reference point to provide this position. 2. Description of the Prior Art When designing data bus systems, it is desirable to determine the absolute position of the data bus without the use of a reference point. This is because when a data bus is initiated and established, it is critical to be able to locate the master section of the data bus. A typical prior art method for detecting the position of the data bus uses a reference clock. The reference clock is then coupled to a device that is used to time the period of the reference clock, and the data is coupled to the same device from a different data bus. A problem associated with this method is the requirement of synchronization between the reference clock and the data clock. When determining the location of the master section of a data bus, it is also desirable to be able to distinguish between different masters and to monitor the data buses during a power failure of the computer, so that the system will not be put into a state of power failure or an inability to test the proper functioning of the system. The Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers (IEEE) has developed a set of industry standards governing the interoperability of equipment from different manufacturers. Some of these standards are known as IEEE standards 1501 and 1502, herein jointly referred to as IEEE standard 1502. In addition, the IEEE has also promulgated a set of standards governing bus drivers, which are known as IEEE standards 1588 and 1596, herein jointly
